Author, Barbara Nick, describes the "story behind the story": "A hard-copy print version is our dream come true. We released our first book, Bella the Dragon, as an early eBook in 2000. It was the Year of the Golden Dragon. When the iPad was launched, the iBookstore was the perfect opportunity to re-release our story with much improved technology. The 2010 version has over 120,000 downloads world-wide with a four-star rating.

We have plans for several stories as part of our "Bella Series". The story of the Chinese Calendar was inspired by a young colleague. During our corporate Diversity and Inclusion week Fall of 2010, I randomly asked a young co-worker to describe the favorite childhood story from her homeland, Taiwan. She described the Great Race and the Lunar Calendar. I was determined to do something with a Bella story in time to celebrate the 2012 Year of the Water Dragon. The result is our 'story within a story' aimed at teaching children about the Chinese culture while demonstrating the need to overcome fear to achieve dreams. Children can watch Bella learn about the animals in the Chinese Calendar as she realizes her dream of flying amid the kites and stars.

"We published an eBook version of Bella and the Year of the Dragon in the Apple iBookstore to test-market the book this Summer. Then we published an audio version this Fall. We finalized our illustrations and text, and then worked with the printer Worzalla, in Stevens Point to print a hardcover edition. The book was released by our company, Catto Creations, LLC, on December 30 2011.

"My long time friend and colleague, Elaine Steckler, is amazing with her colorful, dramatic, and intuitive illustrations. We work together very closely so the reader can "feel the story" through her illustrations. The animals in the story highlight her versatility. Elaine brings life to words through her magical, fluid, and colorful pictures. Elaine's illustrations of Bella with Wind and Sun demonstrate her signature talent of capturing and translating complex concepts and through vivid visuals.

"The person responsible for preparing the publications is my husband, Jay Nick. He does the graphic design and layout, and leverages electronic standards for the eBook versions. Jay stays current on evolving eReader publishing guidelines for devices like iPad, Kindle, and Nook. This allows us to use features and enhancements in newly released technology. Some features we implemented in our publications include: fixed layout children's books, interactive books for Apple iBookstore, read-to-me audio books, and books with embedded video. By understanding the structure of eBooks, Jay leverages the latest eReader features which allows us to be first to market."

Nick continues "Many people think that electronic books will reduce the demand for print versions. That may be true for some books, but I think there is a difference with Children's picture books. We have found that our electronic version create demand and enhance the reading experience for young and old alike. For example, we released the iBook Version of the original Bella the Dragon in July of 2010 and have over 120,000 downloads world-wide. Readers have asked us for a print edition. The reach via electronic media has allowed us to test interest prior to investing in print versions. Our audio versions are intended to compliment the print editions and offer an alternative reading experience. Our grandkids in Arizona love the idea of hearing grandma read their bedtime story—Jay makes it happen."

Nick concludes, "We are an unlikely three-some, but we are lucky that we have different talents and skills. We wanted to celebrate the Year of the Dragon with a story that is hopeful and optimistic---we could all use a little optimism to day!"
